Beckct thought chriftianity confited in prietly dominion--Athanaſius in the vain queftions of a vain philoſophy. Therefore inſtead of the law of kindnefs; inſtead of that divine temper, which fuffereth long and is kind; inſtead of that gentleneſs, which is eafy to be entreated, and which leads us to prefer others in honour to ourſelves--theſe prelates were filled with frife and variance and the bittereft contention. No wonder, then, their conduct was marked with none of thoſe graces that adorn the Chriftian character, and that ought to diſtinguiſh the Chriftian Biſhop. Inſtead of learning wiſdom in the ſchool of adverſity, their minds fat brooding over their loft power and dignity; inſtead of learning humanity, as became their profeſſion, their hearts were foſely bent on recovering their former rank and eminence. To this end, they were reſtleſs, indefatigable, fruitful in expedients; and their expedients partook of the character of the men, dextrous and cunning, but at the ſame time daring, violent, and full of revenge. They inveighed againſt their fovereigns with bitterneſs and acrimony--they treated their names with contempt--they repreſented them as impious and profane, enemies to religion, and the church; and ſucceeded but too well in rendering them hated, and vile, and contemptible among the nations, where they fojourned, and to many of their own ſubjects. They, therefore, both met with very powerful protection; it may be ſaid, from the ſame quarter. 1 he Pope of Rome ſupported them both with all his weight and authority: by which, along with their own reftlefs ambition, they procured fuch power, as enabled them in a very threate...
